She has proven to be a lively, feisty, curious, dirty, rambunctious spoiled, rambunctious and stubborn kitten that refuses to adapt to anything. Being the instigator of many kittens in the past has offered us at times or rather I had a sort of freakish understanding that kittens can be like crazy, hijacking each other's fun and not always chasing imaginary targets. However when Juliana stole Anatollia's toy, out of pure jealousy she seems to show no signs of remorse, she will mimic her motions and it was an important toy for her so she destroyed it!!! And when the cameraman accidentally dropped her toy in

What's new in Sexy Serial Killer:

1 by Joseph "Dr. joe" Kotaba Posted on January 21, 2012 This specialist pack has some interesting ideas and their intentions are very high - perhaps even reaching beyond what some of the bigger-drawing cards in the Duel Deck need. For this review, we'll look at the idea of Banishing a card from the standard definition of a Determinant, a rule that lets you either destroy or banish a card. Can it make sense to banish a card to retire to the twilight zone of next-generation? Is there a future where players will want to retire cards to do other things with them? As a player, do we care that much about this new banishing mechanic in Dueling? Amalthea is a card that allows you to banish a face-down card from play to its owner's hand. It lets you banish a "Determinant". You might be wondering "what the heck is a Determinant?" Today I'm going to unpack that with the help of Dan Emmons and Aubrey Chang, the developers of the The Gathering Deck. Let's jump in and see what a Determinant is and why Amalthea is a card that can remove a Determinant. The Main Deck The Determinant concept exists to prevent Delusive Duelist from being as good as it can be. In Modern play, since Duelist of the Wood is a deluxe piece, players use it as a metagame sweeper. Certain archetypes can't attack if they're not permitted to activate their card at all. In an example like a Cybernetic Horizon deck with Pleasure Pier or a Shaddolls with Morphing Jar, the goal of their hand is to discard its own cards to make it impossible for their opponent to attack. Delusive Duelist moves a card from play to hand for the sole reason of outright discarding the card. Delusive Duelist is a game-balancing mechanism that exists to prevent some cards from being completely dominant. A lot of the art in Modern has illustrated that players should be afraid of cards like Dark Magician (side-effecting deluxe), Haunted Hero (fighting interactively and at a big discount), Mirror Force (single-hits that activate at the end of the turn, ends the turn, and costs zero initiative in dealing a big deathblow

Consider the following pseudo-code: template T& GetMember(T* thisPtr, const std::string& path) { return thisPtr->operator->(); } The idea here is to be able to call GetMember with a pointer to a method of type T. How to do it? The operator->() is not an appropriate operator overload for the return type. I tried to use references, const_casts, move constructions, and what not, but all ways I have tried so far resulted in the compiler complaining "does not match" (e.g. no matching function call to'std::move(__x)' for 'const T'). The return type also needs to be a reference, obviously. I have some constraints. The thisPtr argument is not known at compile time. i.e. the return type is auto. The return type may be a temporary - i.e. it needs to be something like T or T&. The caller of GetMember needs to be able to pass a mutable pointer to a method of type T. I.e. the caller doesn't have to know that thisPtr points to a mutable object, and it isn't guaranteed that it actually does - that depends on the actual implementation and the correctness of the code. This is what I've tried so far: First thing I thought of was a template alias. I.e. this: template using Add
