: An Interview with Katharine McAllister As part of a project that celebrates the timeless art form of live music, we sat down with Katharine McAllister at the Ægo Foundation at Hyde Park in London last summer to talk about her unexpected recording career. Clocking in at just 50 minutes, we found time not only to get to know her but also to briefly discuss her own journey as a musician as well as her favourite albums, the best girl groups and her hopes for the future. Katharine McAllister's incredible music career is a rarity in showbiz. As a singing multi-instrumentalist who has garnered a cult following alongside her unique sound, the Australian-born singer has sold more than 900,000 records, not just here but worldwide. With an infectious attitude and sense of humour, the 39 year old frontman of the New Pornographers and acclaimed Arco Iris project is as humble as she is grounded. She stepped out of music in 2000 after enduring severe anxiety and panic attacks associated with her family's personal problems. Fifteen years later, she decided to revisit and create some of the songs that she'd been writing over the years, and then with the support of the Red Room collective, she decided to take her vision further through her first solo record, Brave Heart Beat. "It all started with a friend of mine who used to be a music agent, George, who really encouraged me. He knew me and loved my work and was a big music advocate. So he had been heavily involved in scouting me as an artist in the past and he knew my work. So it was really because of his encouragement that I just said let's have a go, in a way. After that we decided to go to a recording studio and put some songs on tape." While Katharine is famously shy and is often quiet about the traumas of her past, she proudly recalls her meeting with her musical guru at Cambridge Studio in London. She talks about his advice, and her deep connection with the song Lift Me Instead, which became a highlight of the album and has since been on a few Indie Air compilations. "He had recommended that I had work on that song and I hadn't even really listened to it yet and I said, 'What do you mean?' And I heard the song back at the studio and I really liked it and I knew it made sense. He said, 'Well I'm not sure
