People with COPD experience life's biggest setback, the ability to exhale as easily as they inhale. This in turn causes their lung capacity to decline, which can lead to more breathing problems and the development of chronic lung disease. COPD occurs when the airways become inflamed and narrow over time, said lead author Dr. Michael E. Eisa, a pulmonologist at the University of Colorado Anschutz Medical Campus. "When you have some structural changes to your air way tissue, you have reduced lung capacity," Eisa said, although people are generally aware of COPD symptoms, including breathlessness and a loss of lung capacity, many are not aware of the long-term effects of the disease on their social lives, including issues such as stigma and isolation. Eisa said. For this study, Eisa and colleagues analyzed data from the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey between 2011 and 2014. The survey includes a section on lung health and function, and questions about emotional health and social function. There were 1,338 adults in the survey with COPD and 13,091 adults without COPD. The age of all participants ranged from 20 to 80 years old, and a higher percentage of those with COPD were women (66 percent) and had been diagnosed with the condition when they were younger (68 percent of those with COPD were between ages 40 and 60). Of the adults with COPD, about 56 percent had a mild impairment of lung function and another 38 percent had a moderate impairment, the researchers found. In addition, adults with COPD were more likely to experience psychological burden compared to adults without COPD. In particular, the researchers found that adults with COPD were 12 percent more likely to experience a serious depression or mood problem, 12 percent more likely to report symptoms of anxiety or a phobia, and 11 percent more likely to have a problem with relationships. Furthermore, these problems were more common in middle-aged adults with COPD, with one-third of adults in
