In a typical day, a toddler can track over a thousand potential germs Sara Cotten/Getty Images Whether we love it or hate it, germs are a pretty normal part of life. It's not hard to pick up germs everywhere we go: on our kitchen counter, on the playground or in a doctor's office. According to a September 2012 article in Mayo Clinic Health Letter, the average person gets over a thousand potential germs a day. And a 2010 study shows that 95% of people spend some time each day tracking germs. Despite the seemingly normal role germs play in our lives, there is some debate about the impact of germs on our health. According to recent data from a 2011 CDC study: Over-the-counter (OTC) and

The use of dental sealants may be associated with the development of oral bacteria by pediatricians and primary care providers. This Is What Kids Need to Know About Germs Why does drinking out of glass bottles pose a health risk? Can certain foods be bad for your health? Does it matter what food touches what? If germs are bad for us, why do kids have them? Why do we need to wash our hands? How do we get sick? Why do some people have more germs than others? Where do germs come from? Why is a germ
