I am new to my current role as technical lead, so I don't have much experience. On our team there's one developer who travels a lot, and recently has been paying for lodging for some days at the end of the month. Personally I think that this is not how business expenses should be paid, as not all of us travel; but I don't know how to bring it up with him. Is it OK for a team lead to pay for a single employee's business expenses? I know that there are policies in place to minimize expenses for devs, but I'm not sure if travel expenses aren't already covered by the company. A: It's absolutely not OK if it's private, it's legally required if your company is providing services to people. If you can't talk to your developers about it, talk to your manager. A: At the very least, it's rude. If your business expenses are covered by the company, then it's perfectly reasonable for you to ask if your team member could provide a detailed breakdown of what they're spending. If it's not covered, as you suspect, then you've already communicated your intention to your team member that they may have to be more careful in the future. If the team member is working on a contract, it would be standard practice for the contract to contain stipulations for the business expenses. A: I think you're asking two questions here. What's "OK" and what's legal. Culture (especially on smaller teams) is a huge part of working software at all organizations. At my previous employer, it was common for the team lead to cover expenses -- when it became an issue, it would be brought up with the development lead. If there was an c6a93da74d
