OASIS service may prove useful in pre-screening problematic comments (see below) and ensure that all parties can learn from the comments discussion. Data sharing ============ The OASIS service is designed to promote data sharing among parties that are remote or geographically dispersed. In situations where there is access to the raw data, as in the case of web-based user interactions with a website, individuals may choose to store the results of their interaction with the service in their own database. In this case, the results would then be made available via e.g. a website, RSS feed or automated process. Data can be imported from external sources (e.g. Google, Twitter, Facebook, ResearchGate) to facilitate data mining. A wide range of free and commercially available tools support the import and export of RDF (e.g. Jena Fuse, TopBraid Composer, RDF.js, OpenRDF, Scrapy). One possible disadvantage of this approach is the need to pre-process all input data in order to ensure accurate import into the OASIS system. This is not a problem for external data where an OASIS application can be used only for data import and browsing. It is also possible to create one's own RDF triple store using the available libraries. This approach should be used with caution because the data may not be semantically correct. Practical concerns ================== Although the OASIS application is designed primarily to facilitate data storage and knowledge sharing, it is critical to ensure that the service is safe to use. In this section, we present some of the issues we addressed when designing and implementing the system. In general, all Internet applications that permit user interaction are at risk of eavesdropping and spoofing. The OASIS service is no exception. One particularly interesting aspect of this problem is the risk of "social hacking"
