In general, installing MySQL as a Windows service requires you to log in using the . When run as a service, mysqld does not have access to the console window. Basically, it's good. If you want to install MySQL as a service, then you must be logged in as the user defined in the .htaccess file. However, if you want to open a mysql console window, you can use the mkdir command, which will create a directory for that window. This can be done anywhere on Windows, including the Macintosh, which differs from Windows only in that it has a different graphical environment: GNOME instead of Windows Explorer.
