For help call: GERALD DAVENPORT, Associated Press COOKEVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — A federal judge on Thursday denied bail to a man charged with torturing and killing an elderly Tennessee man who was a veteran of World War II. U.S. District Judge Thomas Phillips set bail at $750,000. It was not immediately clear who put up the money. Marshall County Sheriff's Capt. Derrick Smith and two other officers went to the rural home Tuesday in search of Christopher Ash, 61, who had not been seen in about four weeks. They found his body in a hot tub. Smith told reporters during a news conference that the murder appeared to be committed by torture. Ash was a school bus driver for around 20 years and was hired as a bus monitor at the high school in the Tennessee town of Cookeville, about 30 miles south of Nashville. Smith said in court that Ash's wife of about 20 years, Debra Ash, 38, had been told of her husband's death but that she had not been notified of the murder charge. He declined to say what led authorities to conclude that Ash had been tortured. "All I can tell you is he was found in the tub and taken to the medical examiner's office," Smith said. Ash's family said they were devastated by his death and that they didn't know why he was being charged. "It's a big loss. We just don't have a reason as to why this happened or how," said his brother, Jeff Ash. "There's a big hole in this family." He was a corporal in the Army from 1946-47 and his brother, Bruce Ash, 66, said he was one of five siblings. Jeff Ash said he never
