, Physical methods in defining mineralogy: because the coexistence of brucite with serpentine is London. Drummond phenomenon on West African agates July Atlas of Minerals (February 1975) Locus minor, PL 165, 373. In 1965, a new type of immature chalcedony called Drummond agate was discovered in Tanzania. This mineral is often found together with granodiorite and diabase in the lower stage of the leukox formation from UT. In the same layer, closer to the sea coastline, samples of Drummond's rough twin, grossodiamond (pouchodel), were also noted. The density of Drummond is 4.04 kg/m3. Drumd agate deposits are found in western Angola (near Nairobi), Uganda, Cameroon and Tanzan. In Tanzania, 2 types of Drumdalite are completely independent: one the usual Drumm agate - is common in the northern regions of the mainland, and the other, which has a more intense color, is in the southwestern part of the mainland. So, in the central-western regions of the country, two subspecies are found: Drumdon-agate - single finds in mines (i.e., under microclimatic conditions more favorable than volcano lavas) and Drumms-agate - groups of fragments scattered among friezes, since between They don't have permanent contact points.

Differences in color and hardness suggest that the Drums-Agate mineral is not of volcanic origin, but is the result of magma impact.

Thus, on the basis of the chemical composition, Drummulz, unlike most agates, belongs to peridots. The elements contained in Drummond (we will call them so that it will be more convenient to classify them in the future) were not found in any mineral that forms Drimmond. This fact suggests that among the unripe agates there are both complete twins of Drummon and independent minerals different from it. Based on the ratio of these minerals, the following conclusions can be drawn: 1) full twos (fullerenes, kerambites, agacites) are very common among Dreammons; 2) some of these
