A: The key to building a reliable anti-cheat system for a video game is to always assume that it's the user's fault. If the player is cheating, then they have a goal, and it's possible to track their progress toward that goal. If the game is cheating, then the player has no goal, and so no clues as to how to track their progress. Cheaters will perform actions that are different from the normal use of the game. For example, if you're playing an action game, they might use a controller that lets them walk faster. When the game isn't cheating, they use a controller that allows them to walk at the same speed as everyone else in the game. If the cheating model and the non-cheating model are completely identical, then you have no problem - the game is transparent and anything the player can do in one mode will be doable in the other. If the cheating model isn't identical, though, you'll have to add an anti-cheat step. If the cheating and non-cheating modes share the same basic model of the game, then I would recommend building a new model of the game, and replacing the original game with it. If the cheating and non-cheating models don't share the same basic model of the game, then I would recommend doing something similar to what the Garry's Mod team has done for Garry's Mod, which is to simply make a user who has disabled the anti-cheat system unable to use the game. If you add this new user to the current user database, then when the new user starts the game, they're "injected" with the new user database. The new user doesn't see any game files, so the cheating isn't possible to them. Senate Republicans remain at a virtual deadlock over how to proceed with the chamber's $1.1 trillion tax cut. Senators in the Republican conference largely view the tax bill in a negative light, accusing the GOP leadership of hauling the measure through the Senate in a rush that lacks enough attention paid to the details. ADVERTISEMENT More moderates have been highly critical of the bill's steep reductions to the corporate tax rate, including those delivered to oil and gas companies. Several people atBackground ===== With the introduction of CMLL Semi-annual tournaments in 1991, the promotion experienced a major change in their design and format. A first real shock to the promotion was the creation of the Universal Championship in 1991. A massive tournament of the largest size, majorly by international star power and demanding crowd. This tournament was conceived to establish the champion's status within the promotion and to determine which promotion and promotion team were the major opponents. Two of its participants were Dragon Rojo and Rayo de Jalisco Jr., an unlikely pair. Both Dragon and Rayo had made a lot of noise in the promotion up to that time, but the seeds for the eventual victory of the team were planted then. This turned out to be the correct one since both teams' history would take them to the position they hold today. This tournament is remembered as one of CMLL's favorites. The first and last time CMLL reached the finals was with the Ultimo Guerrero vs Atlantis match in this tournament. At the time of its recording, it had the largest crowd of the tournament (about 100,000). The final between Rayo and Dragon was one of the most violent matches of the early 21st century. It is said that Rayo de Jalisco Jr. was once the greatest fighter to be a member of CMLL, but due to injuries suffered in the match, he would never become the same and would often be paired with either Rey Bucanero or Averno. Rayo at the time was seen as the greatest rival to Blue Demon, and their last match in this tournament had Blue Demon winning his 5th CMLL Championship in one of his greatest matches. The tournament was originally scheduled to be held in November, but for various reasons, the final was scheduled for July of that year. Blue Demon had confirmed that he would not be part of the tournament. The idea of holding it without Blue Demon was not taken well by him and his family. Due to Blue Demon's absence, it was decided to
