Q: when can I use return without input value in C function my scenario: I have a C code like this: `int fun(){ char c1,c2; /* when can I use return here without value? like this: return;` A: You can't. Every function must end with a return statement. This is a key point of the language; no matter how complex the rest of the function is, all its statements must end with a return statement. Without such a return statement, the calling function would be unable to determine the function's return status. So, if you return without an argument, you are explicitly letting the calling function know that the function finished with the given status, but otherwise, must always have the return statement.
