Today we're sharing the first details on how this technology will work in-game. We'll have more information about the technology in a future State of Play post, where we'll share an early demo from the lead gameplay designer, David Cote, and reveal our vision for how we'll use the data for the game. HyperMotion Technology in FIFA 22 will enable players and coaches to be able to interact more naturally with the game via an intuitive in-game interface. In the most extreme form, the technology will allow players and coaches to experience an increased level of realism by using “passes” or “touches” in ways similar to how they would in a real-life match. For example, moving the analogue stick to pass to a teammate can be mapped into a (simplistic) “tap” interaction on the touch screen, and a “corner kick” is mapped onto a “tap” to kick a ball on the touch screen. More interactions with players and coaches will be explored in future updates as we refine and expand this initial concept. What the technology means for players is that they will be able to experience the world of FIFA in a new way, without ever having to touch a controller. The technology will add greater depth and intent to the core footballing game. In this way, it’s built on FIFA’s rich history of momentum-based gameplay and in-game physics, but introduces a new paradigm for action and thinking in-game. In-game actions will be more fluid and natural in the way they are performed. For coach creators, this will mean that they can experience the world of the game in a new way. In terms of gameplay design and creation, we're looking at options in a wide spectrum of potential gameplay possibilities. The breadth of these options is vast. As we begin to develop, we'll share more on this topic - and we'll be rolling it out to our developer community soon. So, what about real-life players? Is this something that they're interested in? Yes. It's always been an ambition to bring this kind of gameplay to the FIFA World Cup in Brazil. The opportunity to be able to go out there and play in front of a global audience is an amazing opportunity for players, coaches ever in FIFA video games. It introduces several gameplay innovations that deliver new ways to play the game on and off the pitch. A SOCIOPATHIC ISLAND The majority of EA's executives are sociopaths, as is the case with their leadership at EA Sports. It's time to reclaim what is rightfully yours: football games. The majority of them are repetitive, predictable, and just plain dumb. Not FIFA. The more you play FIFA's new cover-based 3rd Person Shooters, the more you will notice its similarities to the NBA Live series of basketball games. Why? It's about time that EA did the same thing for football.
