notorious figure in the conspiracy to kill the king of England, Thomas Randolph was executed at the end of the queen's reign. The execution of Thomas Randolph, who took part in the plot to kill King James I in 1605, was carried out with a sword to the neck, as Queen Elizabeth I had ordered. The last, great execution of a Scottish king, as a result of a thwarted plot, almost echoes the final moments of Scottish national hero, James I. Both men were blinded to enhance their punishment. Randolph was so called because, as leader of the Irish confederacy, he commanded an Irish army during the battle of Neufchatel in France in 1588-89, and was captured after the battle. At the time of his capture he had 60,000 Irish soldiers under his command. Randolph was convicted of plotting with other Irish lords to kill the King James I of England in 1605, and sentenced to death in 1606. The king was on a visit to the Scottish border in 1603 when he ordered the execution of Randolph, fearing he would lead an invasion of England. King James I, who had been king of Scotland since the death of his father, James VI, in 1567, feared that his son, Prince Henry,
