David Saunders, who claims to have worked for nearly 20 years as a cook, nutritionist, and food industry expert, says the new system will replace the current one, as the company looks to save money while keeping its customers happy. The company, however, has declined to confirm the report and has no comment on it.

The proposed plan isn't the company's only change; at the moment, Atkins targets those with impaired insulin metabolism – another factor that can lead to weight gain – to use the diet. However, the company says it may still sell the food for everyone else, as well. Atkins has also been rumored to be working on a plan that would allow people to have a low-carb diet but eat almost any foods they like, as long as they also drink more water. For now, those who currently go through Atkins will be able to continue to do so, but there will be new ways to shop for the food. The company will shift its focus from a wide array of products to a more curated menu of options, with the goal of high-quality foods and no artificial sweeteners. Saunders will also ensure consumers get a clearer idea of how those calories will affect their daily numbers, though Atkins had no comment on whether that will mean more calories or fewer. Also in its sights are competitors who claim to offer custom meal plans. The company will replace its current system for its members to receive a weekly menu of suggested foods. There will also be some changes in meal delivery, as well. The meals will be brought to consumers' doors – a surprising innovation in the market, where most companies bring customers to the product. And just in case you 1cdb3666d
