To oversimplify, the domain name "Three Domains" in the possession of the Hachiai Betsuin in Tokyo is being sought by two attorneys, Masatoshi Nishimura and Takako Kudo, who have taken over from Daisuke Kodama, who claimed in a court filing that the domain name was his domain name. It has been shut down by the court, apparently on the grounds that Nishimura and Kudo are using it to sell their legal services and that this is in breach of what they claim is the spirit of the original agreement with Kodama. This domain name dispute is closely connected with the loss and recovery of what are known as "name squatting" domains. A website called Three Domains Names Agency lists a number of current website holders of these domains, some with as much as 400,000 followers. And Tsubasa Shigeta, of the Tokyo-based legal and marketing agency, Shigeta & co., told me that as many as 70,000 domain names such as "Three Domains in Japan" are currently in a similar situation. The Tenrikyo Society of North America, Inc. filed suit in 2005 after the LDS Church bought the domain names "Tenrikyo.org", "Hachiai.org" and "Hachiai.net", saying that the church was using the domain name for an educational purpose and was thus infringing on its trademarks. The church countered that it was using the domain names to avoid confusing the public with the Tenrikyo Society of North America, a non-profit educational organization that is best known as the school that founded the religious denomination Tenrikyo. The court ruled in favor of the Tenrikyo Society of North America and the LDS Church was forced to move its websites to a different domain name. The Tenrikyo Society of North America has since obtained a number of similar domain
