Such electrochromic devices are useful in automatic rearview mirror systems for motor vehicles as a glare reflector mode control, that is, they are capable of automatically changing from a high glare reflectance mode to a low glare reflectance mode when the glare level exceeds a selected intensity value, and vise versa. In such mirror systems, a variable reflectance mirror is controllably energized and deenergized to either remain in the fully reflective, highly glare reflecting mode or to change gradually and automatically to a less reflective and/or transmissive mode, for example, by passing between reflectively high and reflectively low modes. U.S. Pat. No. 6,719,673 and published PCT Patent Application No. WO 2003/038283 describe electrochromic mirror elements comprising front and rear elements that are connected at their edges to form a guarter-round mirror cell. The element comprising the guarter-round mirror cell is mounted in a frame which is in turn mounted in a housing. To increase mechanical stability during operation, the rear element is formed as an elongated element and positioned proximal to the front element. The elongated rear element is preferably of substantially the same length as, or smaller than, the front element. This arrangement results in residual stresses in the material of the rear element that produce, upon operation of the electrochromic device, forces on the elongated rear element that cause it to bow inwardly relative to the frame, which, in turn, creates a "dead space" between the front and rear elements. This dead space provides a reservoir for a portion of the electrolyte that is not utilized by the electrochromic cell at any given time, and may cause an electrical short circuit between the electrodes of the electrochromic cell. Numerous problems may be encountered in forming electrochromic devices and other devices that utilize a glass pane or substrate. The glass panes or substrates may be sufficiently fragile or otherwise physically or chemically weak to be damaged or defective during handling, assembly, and operation of the finished product. The need for tight dimensions and close tolerances
