What's new:

and Gear-heads in Amazonia by Jeremy Diamond While Latin American cultures have long been exalted by filmic critics for spiritual vibrancy and visual invention, what we know of Hollywood has its roots in the “Golden Age” of the 1930s and 1940s. It’s a relatively new approach to art and culture, which assumes European art and culture as standard; for instance, the director who comes to mind is Roberto Rossellini, a proud Centrist, Italian G.I. and museum-tourist during the Mussolini period. But now some rebellious visionaries are rethinking cinema, in Brazil most prominently. Abhay Deshpande’s was featured here last year in discussions about a vital redefinition of cinema in North America and France. Another Brazilian pioneer is Glauco Prosser, whose recent works are described as “tropical Gothic.” Both, like Deshpande, are sensualists trying to shake up the paradigm of standard cinema and personality who are truly multitalented: both play (now) infamously transgressive video games (Prosser also has considerable knowledge of computer science and is an accomplished electronic composer and digital artist), write, translate (into Portuguese), and work theater, among other pursuits. New World Cinema nurtured a spiritually tormented visionary artist in Marcelo Costa, perhaps the younger generation’s greatest auteur. His landmark 12-tonic (a difficult title to explain) film In the Time of Orelhas Negras’s population is suddenly and tragically annihilated by a virus, in an anarchist accident touched with a numinous sense of humor. The film was his final masterpiece. His first film, Leste Brasileiro, blew my previous brain circuits out on Senna and Juventus, and sparked my interest in soccer, which is why, despite my penchant for nudistic sex in films like Head-On, I admire him. My interest in Costa and his work was occasioned by a chance reading of an interview in cinema opinion pieces by English-speaking Brazilian prodigy Rodrigo Mantovani. When I didn't respond to an e-mail, he sent me links to Deshpande and Prosser, both acknowledged as developing cultures in the new culture industries. Deshpande's work is spare and sharp, using filmic expressions to characterize violence, consuming his lurid and carefully orchestrated images. Prosser is more
