It is an extension to an older museum from 1992 that was built in a transition style with modern elements. With its five exhibition halls, the museum can be viewed as a free-standing monument and important form of art in the city. It is the only existing building which combines a museum with a cinema and theatre. The first documentary film by Otto Möller was shown in 1923 as a demonstration at the opening of the museum. The subsequent decades were marked by a constant stream of exhibitions and screenings with titles such as "The system of the great galleries", "My hundred year birth", "Art in Austria", "On the edge of the world. The chronology of Robert Bretschneider", "Kalter Krieg. Art between terror and freedom", "Our world according to the artists", "From the age of the beginning. From the age of innovation", "The free spirit". The idea of the museum is closely related to its founder's ethos, i.e. freedom of expression and the personal outlook on life. The scope of the exhibition space as well as that of the permanent collection is very broad. The museum is divided in five rooms: History and architecture After the inauguration in 1923, with the decoration of the main gallery and during the renovation in the 1970s, Art Nouveau architectural elements were removed from the facade of the building. A new extension was
