Public transport workers in Auckland are likely to have further talks with the Government about a pay offer that will see them take a hit in wages, as the Labour Party seeks to pressure the government into accepting a deal. Photo: RNZ / Alexander Robertson Trade union leaders say talks have been ongoing for more than four months and that their members have been willing to work in support of Labour's demands. About a dozen unions are due to meet before this weekend's Waitangi Day, which marks a year since the country's biggest public transport strikes. The unions have been getting conflicting messages about how much action might be going ahead, with some telling the crowds outside of the Auckland Public Library that talks were proceeding along a path to a settlement. But Labour leader Andrew Little said it had not been communicated in a reliable way to his staff - or to workers - and that was very concerning. Mr Little said the unions were having ongoing talks in an effort to find a common ground. "They are looking to ensure that the minimum wage and equal pay principles are in there - and we are encouraging them to have discussions with the Government," he said. They were expected to have talks about the pay offer, but no further action was being put on the table, he said
