The social network, which has become a platform for some of the American right’s most prominent figures, said Jones’ account was not suspended in error. In its announcement Friday, Twitter said the content Jones was sharing, including videos and tweets, violated the company’s rules against violent threats and other forms of abuse. Last month, the platform enforced a “temporary” suspension against Jones following a violent video in which he threatened a DC-area school. It reinstated his account after it promised to review the matter. The InfoWars channel, one of Jones’ most popular outlets on Twitter, was also reprimanded and given a so-called “violation strike” that counts against him on the platform’s rules. Jones has faced more than 150 such violations of Twitter’s rules, according to The New York Times, and the company can suspend an account when it believes it has gone too far. The company has faced criticism in recent months over its lack of visible action against some of the top leaders of the far right, including Jones. Conservative personalities such as Jones and Infowars’ co-host Owen Shroyer have found success on Twitter by exploiting the platform’s highly polarized political climate to spread disinformation. Their messages have been carefully tailored to strike an emotional d0c515b9f4

According to the organization, it is not possible to accurately track the origins of most genetically engineered seeds. However, researchers at the university have used sophisticated genomic analysis to trace one such product back to Texas A&M University. The discovery could have widespread implications for the biotech industry. "Our genetic analysis is the first to show that genetically modified canola produced in Canada for food uses is derived from plants grown at a specific Texas A&M University research field," said Dr. Bertrand Vrain, a post-doctoral fellow with the Department of Biological Sciences. "These results highlight that seeds companies can only control their products so far as they can control their source." The results of the study,
