That the party's onslaught is being orchestrated by people who seem to have no idea of how much easier it would be if they weren't trying to hurt their fellow Americans should be sufficient evidence that they simply don't know what they're doing. And what they're doing is creating an environment for the kind of "deconversion" that nearly destroyed the Democratic party in the 1990s study, published today in the journal Food Safety: Trends and Developments, suggests that a “minimalist” antibiotic concentration is effective at maintaining animal health, and does not increase the possibility of drug residues in meat. In a previous study conducted by researchers from The University of Nottingham and The University of Sheffield, chickens were fed ground white meat at a concentration of 0.0003 percent of a “broad-spectrum” antibiotic. Although this concentration was 6 to 8 times lower than that used in feed in the United States, it resulted in the E. coli, Salmonella and Campylobacter populations dropping to undetectable levels in two days. At this concentration, the antibiotic did not cause any drug residues to appear in the meat, and the population of E. coli and Salmonella did not rebound. But, the results were not exactly the same in all cases. The population of Campylobacter did not drop to undetectable levels in some of the birds, and E. coli and Campylobacter populations did rebound in others. “It is of great interest that we got some populations down to zero, which is what we hoped would happen. The downside to the study is that some of the populations bounced back, but this is a small price to pay for the good that the lower concentrations of antibiotic achieved,” explains Professor Gavin

Sneddon, from The University of Nottingham. The study also highlighted why some antibiotics are not suitable for use in feed in the first place. “Chickens don’t eat chicken protein. They normally eat grain protein, and in the past we have been using chicken protein as a cost-effective additive to reduce the cost of feed. However, the proteins we have used aren’t well suited for antibiotic use because they are easily absorbed by gut cells, and the antibiotic is able to move into the cells and target the bacteria,” adds Professor Sneddon. “This time we chose the less-well absorbed proteins, but we found that antibiotic can still be effective when we used more
