I book published a fan letter to Yasmeeen a short while back, an updated, more extended version of the same.

It's not that I haven't appreciated her on her own merits before - the book loads a lot on her impressive character, but I thought it might be nice to add some things about what we like to call her invention, which

I've been a bit critical of on this blog before. The present invention relates to a control apparatus for controlling a boiler which heats water to be converted into low pressure steam. Referring to FIG. 1, a conventional boiler 10 is normally provided with a superheater 12 which heats the water to be converted into low pressure steam by contact with the wall of a high temperature chamber 14 of the boiler 10 through a hot water circulation pipe 16. If the heat of the high temperature chamber 14 is discharged out of the boiler 10 at the same time as steam is generated in the superheater 12, then the temperature of the high temperature chamber 14 would be lowered and the steam would be undesirably condensed therein due to the temperature difference, resulting in the growth of scale particles in the high temperature chamber 14. In order to prevent this undesired phenomenon, the flow of the heat within the boiler 10, or within the high temperature chamber 14, is controlled by a damper 18, a thermostat 20 and an overheat detector 22. The conventional control apparatus has some drawbacks. The damper 18 is apt to operate improperly, since the boiler 10 produces a vibration which is accompanied by the generation of steam. Hence, if the damper 18 is not properly closed, the heat within the boiler 10 is excessively discharged out of the boiler 10. Further, the damper 18 is apt to be open due to the above-mentioned vibration, so that there is a possible hazard in that the damper 18 is left open and the heat within the boiler 10 is excessively discharged out of the boiler 10. The thermostat 20 is disposed within a steam condenser 24 and is heated by the steam so that the heat within the high temperature chamber 14 is discharged outside the boiler 10 through the high temperature chamber 14. If the heat within the high temperature chamber 14 is excessively discharged, the temperature thereof is excessively lowered, so that the steam may become contaminated by scale particles. Moreover, the temperature of the superheater 12 is controlled by the overheat detector
