Nubiles - the ultimate nubiles collection! mpeg4-xvid-720p-bestqualityfree-3gp-Q: Safest way to store sensitive user data I'm looking for some suggestions/advice on best approach to store sensitive user information such as passwords (so that if server is compromised, no data from that user is available). What are some choices I have? Currently I store the data in a column on a user table with a hash column (MD5) A: Yes, MD5 or SHA1 or SHA2 are the safest way to store passwords. Well, at least that's the way it's supposed to be. There are many issues in the real world where passwords are hashed improperly and the resulting hashes are much easier to brute-force than they should be. This is the reason for the recommendation of (beware of SHA1, really) To help mitigate this, you need to pay attention to the "cost" of the hash. Meaning if the attacker is required to generate new passwords for all the users, they are going to have to generate many passwords at once. This could mean that you need to increase the password length (more than 8 characters, if I recall), or require a second (or more) piece of information such as a username in addition to the password. A: There is a lot of good advice given, but to address the specific question on passwords hashing: MD5 is a good choice for passwords, but not for other data. I.e. as long as you use a salt, you don't need to worry about the output of the MD5 function producing the same output with the same salt. MD5 is often seen as a poor choice for passwords, but it is not because it produces the same output as the original text input with the same salt. What it is weak at is storing the result in a database. This is because it cannot produce the same output on two different invocations. What you should do is implement a salt, and then use that to compute the hash of the password. Then you have a keyed hash with some extremely high cost to compute, that produces the same output on a given salt input. That means that an attacker has to find a valid hash Occ13bf012
