When it comes to selecting the subject for your photography, the two-fold, rule-of-thumb question to ask yourself is: Is it interesting, and do I have the right equipment to make a decent photograph of it? In this book, I cover both. In Chapter 4, I talk about subjects from the land that invite exploration, like trail photography and waterfalls, in the field. The second set of subjects is focused on capturing large creatures, such as elephants, rhinos, camels, and tigers, among others, that are often seen in cities. Finally, in Chapter 12, I take you to an exotic destination, where your camera and lens can really shine. Keep in mind that the best way to improve is to do the following: Choose a subject and learn about it. Make sure you're familiar with all aspects of its habitat. Practice the techniques you'll be using in your photography. Use both dSLR and point-and-shoot methods to familiarize yourself with the different features available in both mediums. Continue to practice with your camera, reviewing your photographs to critique and critique. Always ask yourself whether your photography is advancing. ## Chapter 1: Landscapes and Wildlife Photography often presents a problem of what to shoot: A landscape is expansive and offers many possible compositions, but a composition requires a specific exposure, a specific angle, or some other element that seems to get in the way of capturing the entire picture. For this reason, I cover both wide- and long-distance landscapes, something like the grandest of views and the most mundane of sounds. Both also require a different approach to composing. While wide-angle landscapes come across bigger than life, with their vastness and expanse, the challenge of the long shot is to capture images of a specific element, say a tree or a peak, that is not the point of the photograph, that is incidental to the subject. Both types of landscape lend themselves well to portraiture as well as wildlife photography. Wildlife photography — the shoot of land-based animals — often presents problems of creating a composition that makes the animal look interesting as it moves about. Plus, it's hard to predict what a wild animal will do. Landscapes and wildlife are my primary types of subjects, and they're covered here. ## Getting ready: Getting Started with Wildlife Photography No one said photography is easy, but if you start with

Nov 29, 2014; Phoenix, AZ, USA; Michigan Wolverines running back Curt Maggitt (21) runs with the ball against the Arizona Wildcats in the first half at Arizona Stadium. Mandatory Credit: Matt Kartozián-USA TODAY Sports The Michigan men's basketball team sat on a 9-0 record and an impressive national ranking. Yes, it was just the preseason, but this Michigan team looked like it could be a contender in the Big Ten. There were good days and there were bad days, but the Wolverines finished the non-conference season strong and are poised for a nice Big Ten start. They have already secured an at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament. But here's a big problem for Michigan fans: the Michigan Wolverines are no longer ranked by the Associated Press or USA Today. These rankings were essential for recruiting purposes, but they also gave us a huge window into the state of the program. If Michigan were to lose the Big Ten, they'd be down to No. 15 or 16. But if Michigan were to keep winning, they could be back in the top 10 by early November. What do you think might be the silver lining of these rankings issues? You can read all the preseason rankings that we've missed on the preseason rankings page! Go Blue!
