But, what about reusable coffee mugs that actually work for coffee? We talked to Gus Nelson, owner of the Haight, to find out. People love coffee. Whether you like a fancy latte or a strong Americano, you should be able to count on getting a good, hot cup of joe any time you want one. Unfortunately, trying to satisfy that inevitable craving while on the go can be pretty challenging. That's especially true if you're on a tight budget. A small cup of joe can easily cost upwards of $5, and that's a pretty penny when you're looking to save money. But according to one handy infographic, you can save over $100 every year by making your own coffee at home. Of course, if that's too much effort, a travel mug is a good option to consider. However, when I bring the XStyle into ListMode, the elements (in my case an open Office Document) seem to be "disassembled" into a single line, just as in the following example: My colleagues who have access to the Visual Studio 2010 IDE are able to fix this issue by converting to the newer com.sun.star.comp.office.XSliderStyle. But I'm using the com.sun.star.style.XSliderStyle... Do I have to use VSTO and embed the com.sun.star.comp.office.XSliderStyle in my solution? Would there be a way to fix this without any solution-specific modifications? A: The solution was to use the com.sun.star.comp.office.XSliderStyle instead of the com.sun.star.style.XSliderStyle. When used with com.sun.star.comp.office.XSliderStyle the division of the list view elements into "slider bars" is done properly
