Structural characterization of human heat shock protein 27 in different molecular conformations using size exclusion chromatography. Heat shock protein 27 is a highly conserved molecular chaperone, which is expressed by a variety of cells in response to a wide range of intracellular insults. It is an essential and constitutive constituent of the cellular stress response machinery. It binds to other stress-responsive proteins as well as peptides thereby acting as a protective agent and also functioning in apoptotic pathways. It can exist in three different states, monomeric, trimeric and tetrameric. In this work we have examined structural changes in human heat shock protein 27 monomer in response to heat shock, after covalent modification and after acid denaturation. We were able to characterize the oligomeric conformations of human heat shock protein 27 monomer by size exclusion chromatography. Analysis of oligomeric forms of protein in acidic environment does not show any definite structural transitions of monomer from higher molecular species to lower species. Whereas, analysis of covalently modified human heat shock protein 27 does show that the protein is converted to higher oligomeric conformation. The data implicate various influences on the different oligomeric states of human heat shock protein 27.
