Alginate is the most commonly used natural polymeric biomaterial for encapsulation of hepatocytes. However, the disadvantage of alginate is that the alginate gel easily dissolves and this causes a rapid release of the entrapped cells. This study investigated the alginate 3% system that can sustain the cell growth for up to 45 days in a medium containing 30% fetal bovine serum (FBS) and compared this system with the alginate 2% system. The cell viability of encapsulated HepG2 cells in alginate 3% matrix showed higher viability than that in alginate 2%. However, the cells in alginate 2% matrix showed longer viability than that in alginate 3%. The alginate 3% system showed higher albumin secretion than that of the alginate 2%. The alginate 3% system suggested a sustained release of the entrapped cell growth, which supported the cells for longer period than that of the 2% alginate system. These results suggest that alginate 3% is useful for the encapsulation of hepatocytes for long-term culture.
