some more reasons why i think this is a great opportunity for the wave plugins and their author(s) in promoting the licensing model and making it as easy as possible for them to earn money in the process. regardless of the way they should do it, the market share of cracked plugins are not going down because (in my experience) they are much better built plugins overall than their paid counterparts. its just the crack developers have a way of doing it faster and cheaper, as well as the fact that the crack developers know a hell of alot more about their plugins, and the many decisions that were made prior to the software being released. its not impossible that wave software manufacturers will introduce the "buy a license" model, but it doesnt seem very likely given the current incentives in the industry. it may also be easier to recoup lost sales by taking the crack plugins that were downloaded and replacing them with paid versions. either way, the industry is simply in need of a win, and it would be as simple as that! i think this is a silly argument. pirates arent trying to steal product nor are they trying to fool people, theyre trying to make a buck and many of them are honest people trying to do that. there are pirates who just cant afford it, and there are pirates who are forced to pirate it. if you work for the software company, you should make some extra money by reselling the products and thats what piracy is, which is full of legitimate customers. if anyone should be making money for creating a solution to a problem, it should be the people who can afford it because theyve come up with the solution which theyre selling for a small fee. this model exists in other industries as well like the video industry with professional editing software costs a little more than the consumer-grade equivalent and many editors prefer the professional version. it doesnt mean that the consumer-version is wrong, rather people who can afford it shouldnt have to use it because theyd be willing to spend more.

on another note, there is a problem with the hacking of software. it gives people an excuse to not buy the software they really want. it gives people a reason not to spend the money they would spend on the software if they could legally get it. i suppose that's an extreme example, but there is a problem. and in the end, they will always have an excuse for their failure; it has been said that the reason why pirates look to use cracked software, is that they are not ready for paying programs. this argument is just another excuse for people who don't want to put in the time and effort to learn that free software, but that is only a false argument. people who use cracked software do because they want to learn, they want to do as much as they can with that software, and they want to try out new programs. if i owned a company, i would be doing exactly what you suggest, no doubt about it. the problem is that companies are not in business to make money. it takes money to make money. this is not a new concept, the more you think about it the more it is obvious. companies are in business to make a profit. pirating plugins is not an option for many people. and yes, some people who could pay the premium prices would simply steal a plugin to use for a day or so. but on average, the average person who is not a hacker is going to be more careful and honest, so the net is a loss for the industry. i dont think that most of the people who pirate plugins are actually going to pay the higher prices, because it doesnt make sense. why would a consumer pay $299 for a synth plugin that he/she is going to pirate and use for a few hours? 5ec8ef588b
