A combined-modality approach to diagnosing alpha-1-antitrypsin deficiency (AATD) in Western Europe and its relation to the genetic load of the European population is presented. International experience in treatment and the high cost of prolonged administration of intravenous alpha-1-antitrypsin (AAT) are reasons why this approach has been taken. Along with organ damage caused by excessive, uncontrolled inflammation, AATD is an important risk factor in the development of lung emphysema. While non-invasive markers of AATD have been found to be the best predictors of its development, lung function, rather than a restrictive type, is more useful for screening purposes. AATD plays a primary role in the development of liver cirrhosis and, to a lesser extent, idiopathic bronchiectasis. It has also been described in a number of other disease entities, in which the causal link to AATD is clear.1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a fuel supply system for a wood burning stove, and more particularly to a control system for controlling the fuel supply to such stove. 2. Description of the Prior Art A good description of current wood burning stoves, as well as the problems associated with controlling them is found in an article entitled "The Development of Recent Wood Stoves" by M. J. Boers and J. H. Kipps, published by the National Homeowners Association in October 1976 and which is hereby incorporated by reference. This article is listed in the Bibliography on Page 1143 of Volume I of the 1977-1978 Fuel Control Institute, Wood Waste Fuel Stoves by H. C. Nieto, Northwood, Inc., Sun Valley, Calif., USA. A further description of a wood burning stove described in said article is given in the article "The Development of a Wood Burning Stove, the Hot Hearth" by M. J. Boers and J. H. Kipps, published in Energy in the 21st Century by the Energy Department Research, Development and Innovations Office. This article is
