Amanita tuta Amanita tuta, the home pansy, is a small edible mushroom of the genus Amanita found in North America. Taxonomy A. tuta was first described by the mycologist Charles Pegler in his 1946 publication Mushroom Hunters Guide. The specific epithet refers to the neotropical genus Viola. The mushroom has only been found in two states: Alabama and Tennessee. Amanita tuta is a synonym of Amanita chrysophana, and was synonymized by Julian Nash of the United States Department of Agriculture, Economic Research Service in 2008. A. tuta is thought to be closely related to the similar-looking and edible A. astigma. The Italian mycologist Pio Maria Bosca, who described several of the mushrooms in the 1990s, thought the relationship between the two species was not that close and suggested that the two mushrooms should be treated as distinct species.

Description The fruiting bodies are irregularly shaped with lobed gills, and attain a diameter of up to . The color of the cap ranges from pale greyish-brown to dark brown, and turns greyish when dry. The stem ranges from long, with a diameter of or less. The stem is even in thickness for its entire length, and is solid or hollow when young. The bittergill has a distinct whitish color. The spores are pinkish-brown, and are 4–5.5 μm wide, and the basidiospores are roughly long and shaped like boomerangs. Similar species

Amanita tuta resembles A. astigma (syn. A. chrysophana), and, to a lesser extent, A. borealis, and A. tigrinu. A. astigma is smaller (up to) than A. tuta, and grows more slowly. A. tutan is mainly found in the southern United States, whereas A. astigma is common in New Jersey and New York, and can sometimes be found in Alabama. A. chrysophana, which was not described and named until 1975, has a smaller club-shaped cap (up to), and similar poisonous properties. Habitat and distribution A. tutan has been found growing on the ground or as a subaerial myco-assemblage on

Among them is American born, Swedish-raised director Jonas Wind (We Are What We Are) whose latest film Tuff (which was made in Swedish) has been nominated for an Oscar. Tuff tells the story of a group of teenage boys in Stockholm who try to make ends meet by carrying out petty robberies. One of them meets a girl who he falls in love with, and becomes a prostitute. She is only 15 years old and earns almost as much as her lovers. The film has been denounced by critics as not so much an exposé on the Swedish youth as a cynical and immoral indictment of its former Swedish welfare state.

LOUISVILLE, KY - SEPTEMBER 09: Cassie and Ruby, puppets of The Puppeteers of Louisville, perform as part of the Puppetry Show at The La Brea Tar Pits on September 9, 2013 in Louisville, Kentucky. (Photo by Gail Fischer/Media General/The New York Times) Updated at 3:10 PM CDT on Thursday, Dec 1, 2013 The La Brea Tar Pits in Los Angeles can be a challenging place to visit, but the offer to watch puppets perform is worth the trouble, especially if you're a fan of "Sesame Street." "Sesame Street at the Tar Pits" is an annual event, presented by Sesame Workshop. Last year, more than 2,000 people took in performances by "Sesame Street" characters as well as a puppet show and another one called "News You Can Use." "We really like the spectacle of the puppets and the storytelling in a landscape like this," said Megan Brooks, of Sesame Workshop, who also presented the 2012 program. "You're in this wild, creepy world, and then you get a surprise moment when Kermit the Frog pops up." This year's puppeteers, all of whom are also actors, are expected to appear on stage about 9:15 p.m. f988f36e3a
