.Long-term anxiety follow-up of a multiple trauma patient with a history of intrauterine hypoxic ischemic encephalopathy. Pregnancy has been shown to be a risk factor for the development of post-traumatic stress disorders (PTSDs). Yet, the actual long-term outcomes of prenatal hypoxic-ischemic encephalopathy (HIE) on PTSD development are not known. This study used a semistructured interview to assess long-term outcome on PTSD in a 40-year-old male with a history of intrauterine HIE. The patient had been hospitalized for early pregnancy complications 2 years prior to his current presentation. He had a history of 3 prior traumatic events and had long-standing mild post-traumatic stress symptoms, including avoidance, negative beliefs, and anxiety. However, the most recent event triggered a return of significant PTSD symptoms, which he sought treatment for. Our results suggest that pre- and perinatal HIE may contribute to the development of long-term PTSD in late adulthood. The coolant flowing through a nuclear reactor absorbs neutrons that would otherwise contribute to fission and to the formation of new reactor fuel. Some thermal nuclear reactors have a so-called "breeder" cycle in which some of the neutrons absorbed by the fissionable fuel are captured by a fertile fuel to form fertile fissile nuclei, which do not undergo fission but can themselves become fuel upon further irradiation. Breeder cycles are desirable for a variety of reasons, including their ability to produce more fissile material than is consumed in the cycle. Radioactive waste produced by reactors using fertile fuels, as well as other waste produced in the use of nuclear power, is stored in canisters in a containment building to prevent radioactive contamination of the environment. The containment building, which is typically elevated and connected to the reactor core by a ductwork carrying coolant, houses the storage canisters and a filtered drainage system to remove any escape of radioactive or non-radioactive contamination into the environment. Unfortunately, if such a containment building is damaged, contaminated, or otherwise destroyed, the flow of coolant within the containment building will cease, and the source of a contamination release from the reactor will no longer be flushed through the drainage system. As used herein, the term "contamination release" means contamination of the environment by a material that enters the containment building and escapes through the drainage system. If there is no replacement flow of coolant within the
