This invention relates to the gasification of carbonaceous solids, and more particularly to the gasification of coals and coal derived solids. A variety of techniques have been proposed in the past for converting carbonaceous solids such as coal to a gaseous form. At least one such process provides the carbonaceous material in a form suitable for directly combusting the material, as in a pulverized coal-fired furnace. However, in more recent gasification processes the material is generally converted to a form in which it can be reacted with a gaseous oxidant to form a gaseous mixture of carbon monoxide and hydrogen. The oxidant, usually air, is typically mixed with the solid particles and passed through a gasification zone. The presence of the oxidant, especially oxygen, promotes
